

QUIZ 02

Is It Actually Me, or Have I Been Gaslit?

18 questions · Scenario-based · No clinical language

This quiz isn't here to label you. It's here to help you tell the difference between someone who genuinely has a pattern of harm — and someone who has been told, repeatedly, that they are the problem.

Answer based on your consistent patterns across time, not who you are on your best or worst day.

SECTION 01

Accountability & Repair

Q01 When you realise you've hurt someone, do you feel genuine remorse? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q02 Can you apologise without needing to explain yourself first, or make the other person understand your side? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q03 After conflict, do you reflect on your own role — even when it's uncomfortable? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q04 When someone gives you critical feedback, do you consider it internally, even if you disagree in the moment? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q05 Do you try to repair things after conflict, rather than waiting for the other person to come to you? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

SECTION 02

Empathy & Perspective

Q06 Can you genuinely consider another person's point of view — even when you believe you're right? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q07 Do you care about how your actions land on others, not just how they were intended? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q08 Do you feel uncomfortable when you realise you've caused emotional harm, even unintentionally? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q09 Can you hold the idea that two people can both be hurt in the same situation, without one being wrong? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q10 When something isn't working between you and someone else, do you look at what you might adjust? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

SECTION 03

Relationship to Power & Control

Answer these as honestly as you can. There are no wrong answers — only patterns worth noticing.

Q11 Do you feel a strong need to be right, or to have the final word in disagreements? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q12 When someone disagrees with you, do you withdraw emotionally or become cold toward them? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q13 Do you use silence, distance, or withholding affection as a way to regain the upper hand? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q14 Does it bother you when people close to you make decisions independently — without consulting you? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q15 Do you find yourself thinking you handle things better, or understand things more clearly, than most people around you? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

SECTION 04

Self-Questioning Context

Three final questions — these ones are worth sitting with slowly. Bring to mind a specific difficult or challenging person or relationship in your life, and hold that in view as you answer.

Q16 Did the question "Am I the problem?" arise after a period of repeated criticism, blame, or being told you're always at fault? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q17 Do you question yourself more inside this relationship than you do in other areas of your life? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

Q18 Do you feel clearer and more grounded when you have distance — physically or emotionally — from this person? No / Rarely · Sometimes · Often · Almost Always

YOUR RESULTS

What Your Answers May Reveal

RESULT 01

You're Self-Reflective, Not the Problem

People with entrenched patterns of harm don't ask this question sincerely. The fact that you're here — genuinely wanting to know — is itself meaningful data.

This result suggests you have access to empathy, accountability, and self-reflection, even when it's uncomfortable to sit with.

Questioning yourself isn't the same as being at fault. It often means you care deeply about your impact and your responsibility to others.

If anything, this pattern points to someone who may be absorbing too much blame — not too little.

NEXT STEP

The fact that you're asking this question often means you've been carrying responsibility that wasn't yours to carry. A Field Guide to Reality Distortion explains how that happens — how self-reflective people become the ones questioning themselves, while the actual pattern goes unnamed. Reading it tends to relocate the weight back to where it belongs.

[LINK]

RESULT 02

You've Likely Been Distorted Into Self-Doubt

This result suggests your self-questioning may not be coming from who you are — but from who you've been told you are.

When someone consistently reframes issues, redirects blame, or quietly undermines your sense of reality, it can lead even the most grounded person to wonder if they're the problem.

This isn't a personality flaw. It's a predictable and well-documented response to sustained reality distortion.

Clarity almost always returns once the pattern is named and understood.

NEXT STEP

A Field Guide to Reality Distortion is where the pattern gets named. It walks through the eight mechanisms that produce this kind of self-doubt — how it builds, why it sticks, and what shifts when you start to see it clearly. If you've been wondering whether you're losing your mind, this is the book that gives you back your reference points.

[LINK]

RESULT 03

There May Be Patterns Worth Examining

This result doesn't point to anything fixed about who you are. It points to patterns — and patterns can shift.

Your responses suggest there may be some areas worth looking at more honestly: around defensiveness, the need to be right, or how your emotional responses land on others.

Everyone has blind spots. The question is never whether they exist — it's whether you're willing to look at them.

The fact that you took this quiz, and took it seriously, already means something.

NEXT STEP

A Field Guide to Reality Distortion may still be worth reading, even from where you're standing. It describes the dynamics from the receiving side — what it feels like to be on the other end of patterns like the ones flagged here. That perspective can be useful, both for understanding people in your life who may experience you this way, and for shifting some of what your responses pointed to.

[LINK]

This quiz is for educational and self-reflection purposes only. It does not constitute a clinical diagnosis or professional assessment. If you are experiencing distress, please seek support from a qualified mental health professional.